

'Paddington's Adventure in Paris'

Written and illustrated by Class 1E

One stormy night Paddington was in a boat on the sea. There was a big wave and Paddington was a bit scared. The sky was pitch black and there was frightening lightening! Paddington was on the boat for a very, very, very, very long time.

Soon it was morning. The sun has risen in the sky. Paddington felt warm, happy and safe. Suddenly Paddington saw land. He felt really excited. He tried to sail to the land and followed a channel of water around a corner. The channel of water became narrow and Paddington sailed on looking at all that he could see.

Before long Paddington arrived in a city. It was a really busy city. Paddington felt worried and scared because it was a very different place to Peru where he had come from. Paddington got his suitcase from the boat and his jar of marmalade and carefully jumped off the boat.

Paddington walked very slowly along a very long road. The road was very busy with cars and people. Paddington read a sign that said the road was called 'Champs Elysees'. He was so amazed at all the tall buildings that whilst he was looking up he dropped his jar of marmalade and it smashed. CRASH! Luckily he remembered what his Uncle had told him and always kept a marmalade sandwich in his hat for emergencies only.

At the end of the long road was a very big building. Paddington looked for another sign to see what it was called. It had a rather strange name. It was called The 'Arc de Triomphe'.

Paddington began to feel a little tired and his tummy was beginning to rumble. He looked for a café. The food was a little different. He decided to choose something called a 'crepe' to eat.

He had strawberries and chocolate on it. He thought it was delicious but not as yummy as his marmalade sandwiches.

The afternoon had come and Paddington ran back to his boat very excited at all he had seen, but to his great surprise his boat had vanished! (Dun, dun, dun!!) What could he do?

Paddington saw a tall building. He had heard people talking about this special building. It was called 'The Eiffel Tower'. He climbed up to the top (which wasn't easy with his paws), but he could not see his boat anywhere. He then remembered that he had binoculars given to his Uncle Peru. Paddington looked through the binoculars and suddenly spotted his boat! It was on some water near a palace.

Paddington suddenly realised that he was in Paris. He had a map in his suitcase and looked at it to find how to get to the palace. The palace was called 'The Palace of Versaille'. In the palace lived a King, a Queen and a Princess. The palace was surprisingly big and the garden was very pretty.

When Paddington arrived he was welcomed in by the King and Queen. The Princess thought that he was cute! As he was hungry the King made him anything he wanted to eat.....Can you think what that may have been? Of course. It was a marmalade sandwich. Everyone had one too.

It was nearly dark and Paddington had explained about his lost boat. The King and Queen explained that the boat had been found floating down the river so was brought to them to be looked after.

They helped Paddington to put his boat back into the river and told him which way he had to go back to the big sea. Paddington thanked them for their kindness.

As the wind blew, Paddington drifted back into the sea and began his next adventure wherever that may take him. The End.
